- Find the nouns in the lists for tasks and duties (for example do the dishes). Which verb is the most often used? Which tasks are exceptions?
- Find expressions in each column that can be substituted by a single verb. (For example you can do damage to something or just damage something.) Which column has the most?
- Find expressions connected with the following:

speaking	experiencing something	producing something using your hands, your mind or your skill	physical actions
make/give a speech	have an accident	make dinner	have/take a bath

Can you see any patterns emerging? Are there any exceptions?

- 4 How many items can you find that collocate with more than one of the verbs (for example you can have or take a bath)?
- 5 Complete each of the following sentences using do, make, have, take or give (more than one answer may be possible). If the noun in the example is not in the table above, look for a similar noun. For example, fortune is not in the list but money is. You can check your answers by looking up the entries for the nouns, but try to predict what the verbs will be before you do this.

Labels used in the dictionary

Labels used in the dictionary generally apply to the collocation – that is to the two words in combination – and not to the individual words.

The following labels are used with collocations that express a particular attitude or are appropriate in a particular situation.

disapproving collocations show that you feel disapproval or contempt, for example rabbit food or descend into the realms of sth.

figurative collocations use language in a non-literal or metaphorical way, as in morally bankrupt or die of embarrassment.

formal collocations are usually only used in serious or official language and would not be appropriate in normal everyday conversation. Examples are take up employment and fall sick.

historical collocations are expressions for things or concepts that existed in the past. They either no longer exist (debtor's prison) or the modern equivalent has a different name. (The modern term is lending library rather than circulating library.) However, the historical term is still used when talking about the past.

humorous collocations are intended to be funny, for example veritable banquet or ply sb with tea.

informal collocations are used between friends or in a relaxed or unofficial situation. They are not appropriate for formal situations. Examples are class act and a company goes to the wall.

ironic collocations use words to mean the opposite or something very different from the meaning they seem to have, as in princely sum (= a very small amount of money) or conveniently ignore (which may be very convenient for the person doing the ignoring, but not for anyone else).

literary collocations are used mainly in literature and imaginative writing, for example far distant and greet the dawn.

offensive collocations are used by some people to address or refer to people, countries, etc. in a way that is very insulting, for example banana republic.

old-fashioned collocations are passing out of current use, although writers may still wish to use them for a particular effect, especially in fiction. An example would be give sb in marriage.

saying describes a fixed collocation that is a well-known traditional phrase, for example the truth will out.

taboo words are likely to be thought by many people to be obscene or shocking and you should avoid using them. They are included here where the collocations are very strong. However, these words are always taboo, whatever the collocation.

technical collocations are used by people who specialize in a particular subject area.

The following labels also show collocations from particular subject areas:

business
computing

law
mathematics

medical military

science
sport
